Research, Teaching and Service Interests

I am an anthropologist and museum professional who specializes in the archaeology of South Asia. I began my academic career as an anthropological archaeologist working on the imperial city of Vijayanagara in Southern India, an abandoned capital of an empire that once ruled over an estimated 25 million people from a center of some half million residents. My work at Vijayanagara focused on material culture variability – particularly ceramics – and distribution in a city defined by cultural, religious, linguistic, and ethnic diversity, with an interest in the roles and significant of material culture in shaping and expressing social identities. This work led me in two directions: to general theoretical and methodological work on the comparative archaeology of early empires and to expanding interests in political economy, material culture, craft production and specialization in state and imperial societies. Throughout my work, I take a comparative perspective, drawing on the specifics of the particular foci of my research, while also seeking to make my work relevant to scholars studying imperial formations and political economies far beyond my particular South Asian focus.

My current work in India continues my interests in material culture, political economy, and craft specialization, but on an earlier period during which social and political inequalities were first institutionalized. This has been the focus of my most recent field project, which currently is in the writing and analysis phase.

My interest in and commitment to museums comes in part out of my research interests in material culture. It also comes from my career trajectory, as a curator of Asian collections in a university anthropology museum. There I was exposed to the challenges and serendipity of collection based research, teaching, as well as the ethical and legal responsibilities of caring for collections, many of which were acquired in colonial or ethically problematic ways decades ago. As a curator of wide-ranging collections, my intellectual horizons expanded beyond South Asian archaeology, and I published scholarly research and curated exhibitions on colonial photography, ethnographic materials from Tibet, and Philippine and Chinese archaeology, among other topics. I also became increasingly interested in museums theory and history, commitments that were strengthened when I became director of the University of Michigan Museum of Anthropology, and subsequently, of the University's Museum Studies Program. My administrative and teaching roles in the program strengthened my intellectual grounding in, and commitment to, museums as key locations for research, teaching and community engagement – with source and descendant communities and diverse publics. My decision to move to the University of New Mexico in 2018 was a result of my growing commitment to the potentials and richness of University museums in general and the Maxwell Museum in particular.

My teaching interests similarly encompass both sides of my professional life: as an anthropological archaeologist and in museums studies. And in my role as Maxwell Museum Director, I am especially interested in better integrating museum collections into pedagogy, both my own and of faculty from anthropology and departments across the University.

As Director of the Museum, most of current service work is centered there. However, I strive to be a good citizen in the Department of Anthropology and UNM, as well as through my professional service outside of UNM.
